Some Man to be Surprised.

I was in Mune. Hawitt's carset institution the other day, on Nineteenth street, when the wife of a rich brewer brought her two daughters in to be newly rigged with stave and cird ige, "Dan's get them cirse's too tight," was her partial admonition, as she left them awaile. The State Agricultural Department of Hichigan has received replies from 795 farmers making estimates of the cost of raising crops. The average cost of ore acre of wheat is $15 28, distributed as followe: Plowing, $1.79; fitting for seed, threshing, $1.51, marketing, S7; interest at per cent., $3.58; repaire, 95; total, $15.26. The value of the atraw per acre is placed acre, which was 71 cents per hushel. The coet was greater in southern counties than in the northers, but the amount received for wheat was more. The cost of raising oets averaged $13.84 gross, or $11.89 net, equal to 29 4 cents per bashel. The average price of raising corn was $1339 per acre gross, or taking out the value of the atalka $15 68, equal to 20.0 centa per bunh.

The editors sthroughout the State who are lamenting the lack of legal talent in the Legislature probably forget how many lawyers were members of the last se sicn. Just fifty-seven in the two houses, with fifty farmers and thirty-one members from all other occupations. If fifty seven lawyere cannot insure the framing of the legislature acts in approved legal style it is time that better men at the hir were demanded. It is not surprising that all lawyere do not know how to write new laws when it is considered how many enter the profession without any general education. -[Commercial.

W. P. WALTON.

For some time past a periodical item to the effect that John R. Wolf, the young man sent from Georgetown to the penitentiary for 10 years for forgery, was dying in that institution and we were beginning to believe that a studied attempt was being made thereby to prepare the public for a pardon, but we are glad to report that such was not the case, for Wolf has actually yielded up the ghost. Toe fate of this young men should be a terrible warning to those who may be tempted to get money dishonestly. He belonged to a good family, moved into the hest society and had every prospect of making a worthy and respected man of himself, but women, wine and cards were too much for him and he forged checks to the amount of several thousand dollars. All that money and influence could avail were used to prevent his punashment, but he was convicted and sent to a felon's cell, where he concocted the prison revolt and carried it Into effect last August. Several noted prisoners succeeded in escaping, but he fell terribly wounded and his death Saturday was the result of thees wounds. We hope his death may not be without its good results.

THE Mt. Sterling Sentinel Democrat de mies that its citizens stood ready to sign a petition asking a commutation of Neal's punishment, as the Gazette stated, and in the course of a well timed article says: "We are not of the class that opposes capital punishment. We believe that 'the land cannot be cleaned of the blood that is shed therein save by the for his dismissal. There were hut two votes blood of him that shed it.' We believe that no man guilty of all three of the crimes, which are charged and proven upon Wm. Neal, ought to live. Nothing but she life of this man can eatiefy the law or the demands of justice."

"I wonil rather not talk about the case," he said sharp'y. "Nothing for many years has so much ann oyed me." Why! Your client only met with his

"True-trus. But I am a inwyer, sir. Our province is not to think so much of deserts as of what we can do for a client, It is hard to try and serve a fool."

"No doubt; but I scarcely understand your meaning."

"Menaing! I could have saved that man. There was no evidence to speak of against him. What dil it amount to! A pistol of n peculiar make found lan field haif a mile away from the scene of the murder; one man who could swear that the pistol was my client's property - a pawnbroker, to whom he wanted to sell it. Positively, sir, that was the whole case for the Crown. Never so disgusted in my life-never!"

The excitable little man's looks showed that his disgust was not assumed.

So the pistol which I had thoughtiessly burled away had, after all, furnished the eliwant brought the criminal to justice. Although I was now quite satisfied that the right person was to suffer for the dark crime, I resolved to get a'l the additional information I could.

"But why did he plead guilty?" I asked True Padence 1

"Because he was a fooi," rapped out Mr. Crisp. "It was like committing sulcide. I don't care n button for the man himself; but I confess I was nunoyed nt seeing my case ali knocked to pleces by his obstinacy. I went to him; if you were in court you no doubt saw me. I begged him to withdraw his plea. I told him I could save him. Yet the fool insisted."

"Did penitaucs or remorse urga him?" "I don't know. He could have had more lot me sare him from the gailows. No; ho says, 'It's no good—tot a bit of good. You slou't know all I know. There's some one in court who knows all about it—saw it all done. She's come to hang me.' I have no sight. I hurried on back to I hillppa and time for penitence and remorst if he had isat for some moments in deep thought. The solicitor looked at me as if he fancled I should join her. Two things only detained had already taken up as much of his valuable time as he could spare.

"Is there any way of gaining access to the condemned man?" I said. "Could you, for inslance, get an order to see him?" "No doubt I could; but I have no object in soeing him." "I will give you an object, ' I said. "I want you to see that man, and if possible got a written, or at lenst dictated, confession from him-not of the bald fact that he is guilty, but of all particulars connected with the murder."

Mr. Crisp looked surprised, and expressed his opinion that it was all but impossible to obtain what I wante i.

I had taken rather a fancy to the bris's apaken, sharp little min. He seemed to me trustworthy; sr that, after conslieration. I determined to could to him my reasons for making this request. Under the assurance of professional secrecy, I told him briefly so usuch as I thought fit of Philippa's and my own connection with the events of that night. He distend with an interest which augured well for the reception which awaits the sombre tale I naw give to the world. His curiosity seemed excited, and be promised to see the convict, and if possiles learn all I wanted to know. I left my address and hade him gold day.

i dil not care to linger nt Tewnham; so 1 walked down to the railway station, intending to roturn to town by the next train. As wnited on the platforns a down train carno in. A su lden impulse seized me. The dny was still young. I had time to spare. I crossed the bridge, entered the train, and in a quarter of an hour was at Rolling. 1 went there because I was impelled by a desire to once more visit the actual scene of the beginning of all these troubles.

I walked that road which Sir Mervyt. Ferraud had walked that dark night. But oh, how changed everything was! Yet not more changed than our own fives! It was a giorious afternoon in September. The rain of the preceding day had left the earti moist and fresh. The fields, on either side of the read, were gleaming with that bright, pure emerald which they wear after the rethless scythe has swept away the ripe grass and the margnerites and other flower which grew among it; or ofse they were filled from hodge to hadge with a golden men of waving corn, or sheaves waiting to be garnered; for the harvest that year was not early. The wild roses were loss over, but fragrant honeysuckle and other wild flowers still made gay the hedge rows and banks. The birds find awakened from their August ellence and were singing once more. The great sleepy cows lay under the shade of the trees. The inrge mows of now hay stood side by alde with their dingy looking but more valuable eider brothers The whole land seemed wrapped in happy autumnai repose. The scene was calm, peace ful and thoroughly typical of England, & beautiful it was, so full I now felt of love for my native land that had those pages beer then written I should upon my : eturn home have erased all my glowing description o.

A breath of soft but fresh air cam blow ing from the faraway downs. I drow in a sleep draught; I threw back my shoulden and stood erect. Haughed aloud in my great happiness as a comical picture, familiar to my childhood, of Christian losing his burden, rose before my mind, and seemed to be the exact thing wanted to illustrate my own case, Yes, the burden I had borne had falles from my back forever! Ahi here is the spot-the very spot where Sir Merryn feil. It was here, just under that cluster of ragged-robbins, I must have have placed his corpse, little thinking that the kind white snow would hide it and save my love and me. Oh, how I prayed in those days that the bitter weather might last; that as iron grip would hold the world fast until Fullippa's health and strongth returned! It and saved us!

"Where are the snows that fell last year?"

Ahl should I not rather sing, "Where is the grief of yeslerday?" Gone like the snow. Other snow may fall, other grief may come. but iast year's snow and yesterday's grief are gen v forsverl Nevertheless, that spot was too suggestive of horrible remin scences for me to linger long over iti I turned away, and in my great happiness could whisper to myself that I forgave the deal man for the ill he had wrought. May his bones rest in peace! I walked along the road, right on until I came to the cettage in which, like a coward who could not face his troubles, I find spent those nimless, miserable months. It was untenanted. Half deface I auction bills were in the windows and on the doorposts; for some months ago the furniture hal been sold, I pausal and looked at the window by which Philippa had cutered, and felt that since that night I had passed through more grief, passion, fenr, hop) and joy than would fill an ordinary lifetime. Theu I turned and shook the dust off my feet. Never ngain would I como within twenty mlies of this place.

On the roal back, to my annoyance, I encountered Mrs. Wilson, I tried to pass without sign of recognition, but she was too quick for me. She stood in front of me, and I was bound to stop.

She was more haggard, more arawn, more aquillue looking than ever. 11s: eyes nione looked young. They at least had spirit and vitality in them. They positively blazed

"I wrote it for vengeance. She had, I thought, served that man as I ought to have serve I lum; but I inted her for it, for I loved him still. So I thought it would be so sweet for her to know that she had killed her sweet for her to know that she had killed her insband, and for you, her lover—I knew you were her lover—to know that I could at any moment give her up to justice! I was a fool. Why did that man plead guilty! When I saw your wife rise in court I laughed. I knew what was coming. Yow, instead of imming her, I have done her good."

"You have," I said curtly, and turned upon my had. The malignity of this woman was a latterned that I falt rhankful size could."

CLEAU SKIES. Aithough England was now to me and to my wife a land very different from the one we quitte I some eight months ago, we were anxlous to get back to Seville, if only to set ut rest my mother's fenrs. There was with her a haunting drend that the man, in the hops of mitigating his sentence, had pleaded guilty to a crime of which he was Innocent. Even the accurate account which I gave her of the Interview with the solicitor did not quitu satisfy hor. So we waited impatiently for the full explanation,

> The second thing which kept us in London was this. I determined that before I left I would have the fact that when I married Philippa I married Lady Ferraud fully ac knowledged. I found my way to the gartlemen who were winding up the doal man's alfairs, and stated my case to their ncredulous cars. At ilrst they treated the

But not for long, "ludoed, my task was half done. They had already, without any assurance from Mrs. Wilson, ferreted out the late and particulars of the death of the first Lady Ferrand. They had but to assure themselves that the marriage certificate which I laid before them was no forgery,

The administrators, one of whom was, by the Ly, the heir, evidently looked upon me as a thost eccentric personage. Ferhaps it was for this reason, or—as I do not wish to cast immerital blame-perhaps it was Le cause the estate wound up to nothing—well, any way, even to this day we have received communication, much less remittance rem the administrators; nor, to tell the iruth, have I troubled them again. The joy, the wild joy, with which Philippa threw horself into my mother's arms checked all the upbraidings and reproach which we apparently merited. Our return was like the return of n proligal son and manghter. Laughter, tears and happiness!

Although I told my mother nothing as to the delay of any mysterious journey; at the object of our mysterious journey; aithe object of our mysterious journey; aithough she asked me uothing; although no word evidencing her knowledge of what had passed has ever crossed her lips, I know that all has been revealed to her; that Philippa has sobbed out the whole strange tale on her breast. I know it by this, that since the day of our return my mother's deep love for my wife lips shown itself even tenderer sweeter and deeper. Yes, I was derer, sweeter and deeper.
